Autism and the Criminal Justice System

Practical guidance for professionals working with people with autism in the criminal justice system

The Government's Improving Health, Supporting Justice Delivery Plan, based on the recommendations made by The Bradley Report, sets out key objectives for ensuring that people with mental health problems and learning disabilities receive improved health and criminal justice support. Therefore, it is vital that the professionals working in the criminal justice system know how to recognise and interact appropriately with people with mental health problems and learning disabilities.

Autism (including Asperger syndrome) is a lifelong developmental disability that affects how a person communicates with, and relates to, other people. It is estimated that around 1 in 100 people in the UK has autism. Therefore, you or your colleagues are likely to come into regular contact with people with the condition, whether as victims, witnesses or offenders. However, autism is a hidden disability and it may not be immediately apparent that the person you have encountered has particular needs.

This key conference from The National Autistic Society will provide you with the essential tools and techniques you need to identify and interact with people with autism. It will provide you with vital information to ensure that you work to consistent standards and have the right information to bring about better outcomes.

The conference will focus on the challenges faced by individuals working across the system and make recommendations as to how you can meet the objectives outlined in the Government's Delivery Plan. It will also discuss joined-up thinking and explore multi-agency approaches, to ensure people with autism are treated consistently and fairly, and that referrals and diversions are made at the right time.

'Autism and the Criminal Justice System' will help you to deliver real change in the way we meet the needs of people with autism.
